Griffin was born in Philadelphia, but her family has deep roots in the South. Her father's family is from Mississippi, and her mother's family is from Alabama. As a child, Griffin spent many summers visiting her grandparents in the South, and she was deeply affected by the culture and the people of the region.

In Some Places More Than Others, Griffin recounts her experiences growing up in the North and the South, and she explores the complex racial and social issues that have shaped her life. She writes about her experiences with racism, both overt and subtle, and she shares her insights into the ways in which the past continues to haunt the present.

One of the most powerful aspects of Griffin's memoir is her ability to convey the deep sense of place that she feels in the South. She describes the beauty of the landscape, the warmth of the people, and the richness of the culture. However, she also acknowledges the painful history of the region, and she does not shy away from exploring the ways in which racism and poverty have affected the lives of so many Southerners.

Some Places More Than Others is a deeply personal story, but it is also a universal story about the search for identity and belonging. Griffin's journey is one that will resonate with anyone who has ever felt like an outsider, or who has ever struggled to understand their place in the world.

Farah Jasmine Griffin is a professor of English and comparative literature at Columbia University. She is the author of several books, including Who Set You Flowin'?: The African-American Migration Narrative and Beloved Sisters and Loving Friends: Letters from Rebecca Primus of Philadelphia to Eliza Healy of Georgia, 1854-1865.

Some Places More Than Others is a beautifully written and deeply moving memoir that will stay with you long after you finish reading it. It is a must-read for anyone interested in the American South, in African-American history, or in the search for identity and belonging.
